The Endowed Professor, who will have a joint appointment in the two programs, is expected to be a leading expert in aging-related issues with an outstanding record of scholarship demonstrated through publications, funded research, and leadership at the university, national, and international levels. This new professorship is part of a broader commitment by Syracuse University to expand our research and teaching in aging as reflected in the creation of the interdisciplinary Aging Studies Institute.

The Endowed Professor will be expected to work collaboratively with other academic units and departments across the University, including the Aging Studies Institute. In particular we encourage applications by candidates whose substantive interests fit within the following thematic areas of the Aging Studies Institute: age-based public policy and well-being; population aging; health and functioning; and family dynamics, care work, and intergenerational support (for additional information go to asi.syr.edu).

We seek an accomplished scholar who holds a doctoral degree in an aging-related discipline and has a strong, ongoing research agenda in one or more of the previously listed areas. Successful candidates must currently be at the rank of tenured advanced Associate Professor or full Professor. Appointment to the Professor rank will be based on University standards for Promotions and Tenure. Salary is commensurate with experience and qualifications.

Qualified applicants should submit their curriculum vitae, letter of interest, and copies of key publications on-line at: www.sujobopps.com. Names and e-mail addresses of 3 recommenders are requested at the time of application. However, references will be contacted at a later date and only when the applicant is invited to interview.
