Optimal contracts from theoretical models look very different from incentive arrangements used in practice. This paper aims to bring optimal contracting theory closer to real-world contracts. Rather than solving a specific constrained maximization problem, we characterize a large set of contracts that are “near-optimal.” We show how contracts from within this set can satisfy practical properties, such as non-decreasing wages and implementation via organizational hierarchies, that are desirable for reasons outside of standard economic models.